Wildlife Stories

A baby Common Merganser was found in Denver's City Park all by itself. It was bleeding from a cut on its neck, so rescuers called Greenwood right away. Upon arrival, our intake team assessed the young bird to determine the extent of the injuries. Luckily the cut was minor and no longer bleeding.

In the past, rehabilitators have located other nearby mergansers that will happily adopt an orphan. Our staff have been searching for a suitable group for the young waterfowl to join. They will continue their pursuit until the baby has grown into a juvenile. At that point, the chance of being accepted into a new family becomes less likely.

Luckily, we have rehabilitated orphaned mergansers before and will care for it until we find a family or it is ready for release. For now, it will have plenty of fresh fish (unlike ducks and geese that eat greens), a cool pool to swim in with its Mallard friend, and the protection of our enclosure.

Ready for summertime backyard fun, a family opened up a cabinet in their outdoor playhouse only to find five baby raccoons! They called Greenwood for advice on how to safely encourage them to take up residence elsewhere.

Raccoons are great moms and rarely abandon their babies. It is likely she was out foraging when the family found her young. After receiving instruction from one of our rehabilitators, the finders put together a reunite box with the kits inside. Their mom returned that night but put them right back into the playhouse! The family knew the babies weren't orphaned because they had been moved, but still needed mom to take them out of the playhouse. The next night, they repeated the process after boarding up the cabinet. Luckily, mom took the hint and relocated the babies to her backup den. We are so glad they could stay with their natural mother in a safe, new location.

So far this year, 94 raccoon kits have been reunited with their mothers under the careful guidance of our skilled rehabilitation team.
