Wildlife Stories

Every year Greenwood receives several species of waterfowl that are found downed in wastewater treatment plants. In early February, four such cases were brought to Greenwood. Unfortunately, two of the birds didn't make it. We aren't sure what caused their deaths, but our medical team got right to work stabilizing the two Northern Shovelers that survived. Usually these critters just need a good cleaning and time to waterproof their feathers again, but these two were very thin and had sustained head injuries. Each were given pain medication and a warm bubble bath to clean their feathers and warm them up. We expect the neurological symptoms from the injuries to be completely resolved soon. The pair need several more days of preening and weight gain before they return to the wild.

A species that we don't see often was recently admitted to Greenwood after it was found waddling in the road, unable to fly. The Bufflehead is a small-sized waterfowl found in Colorado throughout the winter. A rescuer found her while on a drive to Fort Collins and brought her to us for care. Upon examination, our medical team discovered that the bird had a scratch on her cornea. She also had a head injury causing neurological symptoms and was severely dehydrated and thin. Our volunteer veterinarian prescribed a host of medications to make her more comfortable and aid the healing process.

A week later, the Bufflehead was re-examined. Our vet found the bird's vision had returned enough for her to forage and escape predators in the wild, and she was much healthier and stronger. Nearly two weeks after arriving at the Center, she was released back into the wild on open water.
