A Few Current Patients...

Wildlife Stories

This flock of starling babies was found nested underneath a camper after it was moved for the summer season. With mere pin feathers and soft down covering their bodies, Greenwood knew when the rescuers called that the little ones were only nestlings and needed full-time care by trained rehabilitation staff.

They arrived famished and mildly dehydrated. Meals of mashed berries and live mealworms were being delivered to their huge yellow mouths every 45 minutes, along with a small drink to help with the dehydration. These hungry little fellas loudly let their caretakers know when it was time for their yummys.

After two weeks at our facilities, these babies, still as noisy as ever, have grown into healthy fledglings that can self feed on mixed mash every two hours. Their flock has gained a lone Western Meadowlark friend. Soon, these starlings' time at Greenwood

In the beginning of June, Boulder Animal Control brought five raccoon cubs into Greenwood. The rescuer tried to reunite the wandering babies with their mother for two days with no success. Covered in ticks, these skinny, dehydrated critters were immediately treated for parasites and given the nutrients needed to grow and develop. This nursery of raccoons spent two weeks in mammal quarantine upon arrival to ensure they were free from potential diseases.

Eventually these rambunctious rascals graduated to part-time outside Adventure Camp where they will learn the sights and smells of the natural world for a few hours each day. Their large area is fitted with blanket hammocks, a bowl of water to splash in, and fresh dirt and logs. These features allow them to practice their innate skills, such as hanging upside down and exploring their sense of touch.

will come to an end, and they will be released back into their original habitat to continue their lives in the wild.

With three square meals a day, these cubs have almost doubled in size since they arrived over three weeks ago. As they continue to develop, their caretakers will move them into a long-term outdoor enclosure. There staff will start to hide treats like meatballs within logs to teach them to search for food within their habitats. Adolescent raccoons are cared for at Greenwood for several months before being released back into the wild.

Wildlife Tip

Be sure to comb through your RVs, boats, trailers, ATVs, campers, and any other outdoor toys you might enjoy this summer. Check that there are no nests or baby critters before moving or using them!
